

Estate Planning for Single People

Whether you've always been single, have become single recently due to a divorce, or if you've outlived your partner, being single can provide challenges for your estate planning situation. Unlike having a spouse, there is no "default" person deemed to be able to make estate planning choices and handle estate planning responsibilities for a single person. Because of this, single people need to be proactive in creating their estate plan and sharing the plan with those it may affect.

It's important to remember that estate planning is for everyone, not just the wealthy. Estate planning entails not only handling where your assets may go when you're gone, it also involves planning for your financial and medical needs should you become incapacitated.

Whether you know it or not, you have an estate plan now. If you've named a beneficiary to your IRA or 401(k) that was an estate planning decision. Moreover, if you don't have a will or power of attorney in place your state has default laws for what happens to you and your assets in the case of incapacity or death. Since the state's plan probably isn't what you would prefer, you should consider creating your own plan.

Where Do You Begin?

Figuring out where to start on these issues, or even where to end up, can be a daunting task. To help provide some ideas on what you'd like your legacy to look like, consider first assessing where you are today. What are your assets and liabilities, and how are your assets titled? What are your legacy goals? Do you intend to leave a certain amount of assets to your beneficiaries, or is your goal to live comfortably with your beneficiaries receiving whatever is left? What documentation do you have in place today (wills, trusts, power-of-attorney, etc.) to evidence these goals? Is your current documentation, if any, in alignment with your current goals?

Estate Strategies

By assessing where you are today and answering some general questions of where you would like to go, you're starting to control your legacy. You can now determine what you want to happen if you are no longer able to control these decisions. You can start resolving what may be needed to care for you, your children, your assets, and your health if you were to become incapacitated or how you would like these matters handled after your death.

Outlining these goals will help you evaluate what next steps are needed to achieve your goals. While everyone is unique, and there is not a "uniform" estate plan, most legacy goals can be broken down into five primary categories. We have the ability to control four of them. The fifth concern, estate and income taxes, can be an issue for some. As much as we'd like to control our taxes, the government has the most control over this issue. For those with larger estates, taxes may become a substantial issue.

The following chart summarizes some of the most common estate planning objectives and identifies some common strategies available to control your legacy:

Legacy Goal	Common planning documents and strategies [^]
Asset Transfer: Controlling how your wealth will pass to your beneficiaries either during life or after death	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> *Trusts *Wills *Transfer on Death (TOD)/Payable on Death (POD) *Beneficiary designations *Life insurance *Gifting outright
Incapacity Protection: Selecting someone to make financial and medical decisions should you be unable	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> *Financial power-of-attorney *Health care power-of-attorney *Living will *Trusts
Caring for minor children/dependents: Selecting someone to have legal custody of your dependents and/or someone responsible for financial matters for your dependents.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> *Will *Trusts
Charitable Intent: Donating to charity either during life or after death	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> *Giving outright *Charity as direct beneficiary on assets *Charitable trusts *Donor Advised Funds *Private/Community Foundations
Tax management: Efficiently managing potential income, gift and estate taxes to maximize legacy goals	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> *Gifting outright *Transfer tax planning (Credit shelter trusts, portability, advanced planning trusts, lifetime taxable gifts, etc.) *Insurance planning (ILITs, wealth replacement trusts, insurance as an asset class, etc.)

[^]For more on these documents and strategies see the Essential Estate Planning Documents and Common Estate Planning Techniques articles available from your Benjamin F. Edwards financial advisor.

Estate Strategies

It's important to remember that estate planning often requires you to manage trade-offs and to prioritize your goals. A common trade-off, for example, is the simplicity of the transfer strategy and the level of control it provides. Transfer on death arrangements and beneficiary designations are often simple to implement. However, these techniques provide little control over the beneficiary's use of the funds and little control over tax consequences. For more control, trusts can provide more options. Creating trusts often requires additional costs and introduces more complexity. Depending on the strategy, your trust may even be irrevocable. In short, work with your professional team to balance the legacy goals you wish to achieve with the appropriate tools available to achieve them.

Unique Concerns for Single People

Single people also face some unique differences in their planning. The first issue is selecting who you want to handle these matters for you. A trusted friend or relative, or an adult child, may be the answer, but what if you don't have someone that can handle the situation? For financial matters you may want to consider a professional corporate trustee. For a fee they are able manage your financial affairs, pay your bills, and make investment decisions. This relieves the burden of handling these issues from your friends and relatives.

For health care decisions, most corporate trustees will not handle such matters so you will have to find an individual to help. Most states have advanced directives, also known as living wills, where you can document your end of life decisions rather than naming an agent to make decisions for you. That said, a health care power of attorney is often a companion document to a living will that allows you to name someone to make non-end-of-life decisions for you if you are incapable. For those, an individual is typically selected.

If you are single and you have minor children, this too can create some unique situations. Whether you're the custodial parent or not, who you want as your kid's guardian if something happens to the custodial parent can sometimes be an issue. Is the surviving parent willing and able to take custody of the children? Are you comfortable with that situation if you are gone? If you are leaving assets to your minor children, it often makes sense to consider a trust for their benefit. Do you want their guardian to also be responsible for the children's finances? Each of these unique situations needs to be addressed for the single parent.

For single individuals with larger estates, estate taxes can also be a concern. Each person has a federal estate tax exclusion, currently $11.7 million, which means you can pass up to that amount free from federal estate tax. Several states also have state estate/inheritance taxes that could apply, and many have lower dollar amount thresholds for estate tax liability. While married individuals can utilize various planning techniques to use both spouses' exclusions and pass double the tax exclusion free of federal estate tax, single individuals cannot employ such techniques. If you are facing a potential federal or state estate tax, work with your Benjamin F. Edwards financial advisor along with your tax and legal professionals to see what planning opportunities you may wish to consider addressing your needs.

Putting It All Together

Once you've identified your goals, considered the trade-offs, and have a better understanding of some available planning techniques, the next step in the process is to pull together your professional team to implement a plan to achieve your legacy goals.

Estate Strategies

Work with your Benjamin F. Edwards financial advisor, along with your attorney and CPA, to determine what is best for you. Your plan should also consider common circumstances that may occur that could require modifications to the plan.

Consider contingencies for:

- What happens when you or your beneficiaries have a life event such as a birth, death, marriage or divorce?
- What happens should you or a loved one become incapacitated?
- What happens should you or a loved one face a prolonged illness?
- What effect is there if you move to a new state?
- What should you do if your net worth changes significantly?
- What happens to your plan if there is a change in the law?

While we can't always predict the changes that we may face, we can prepare for the most likely scenarios. Addressing what you would like to happen should these events occur can help solidify your planning. Moreover, most planning can be changed at any time, so you often have the flexibility to deal with most unanticipated circumstances. However, you must remain proactive in your planning to address these changes. Only you can control your legacy.

If you've taken the time to assess your legacy situation, determine what goals you would like to achieve, and work with your professional team to start documenting those goals, there are two ongoing and paramount steps to securing your legacy:

Implementation and Review.

Implementation: Once you have your plan in place, you have to implement it correctly. Common things to address for many legacy plans:

Titling: Are your assets titled appropriately for your plan?

- If you have a will as your primary plan, do you have assets passing through probate so that your will controls what happens? Items titled as joint tenants with rights of survivorship, assets with beneficiary designations, assets with transfer on death instructions, etc., do not pass through probate generally, and therefore will not pass per the terms of your will.

Implementing the plan correctly and periodically reviewing the plan are paramount steps to securing your legacy.

- If you have a living trust as your primary plan, have you titled your assets into your trust? Simply having a trust doesn't mean your assets will pass per the trust terms. Again, joint tenancy property, beneficiary designations, transfer on death instructions, etc. control the distribution of those accounts, not the trust. However, titling those accounts into your trust allows for the provisions of the trust to control those assets.

Beneficiary designations: If you are using beneficiary designations/Transfer on Death provisions you need to review those designations to make sure they align with your legacy goals. Are they up to date? Should you be naming your trust? Is there an ex-spouse named on an older account? Out of date or inaccurate beneficiary designations can circumvent your legacy plan.

Estate Strategies

Review: The most important aspect of any plan is to review where you are to assure your legacy goals are being met. Life is always changing, and you may need to change with it. Review your plan after life events happen to you or your beneficiaries (birth, death, marriage, divorce, etc.), should the law change, or at least every three to five years. By remaining diligent, you can assure your strategies remain aligned with your legacy goals.

Few enjoy preparing for their possible incapacity or their own demise. However, failing to prepare for these unavoidable items leaves your personal and financial goals to your state's default rules. By proactively addressing how you would like your health, your finances and your loved ones cared for when you're no longer able to manage those decisions on your own allows you the peace of mind that you control your legacy. ■

IMPORTANT DISCLOSURES The information provided is based on internal and external sources that are considered reliable; however, the accuracy of this information is not guaranteed. This piece is intended to provide accurate information regarding the subject matter discussed. It is made available with the understanding that Benjamin F. Edwards is not engaged in rendering legal, accounting or tax preparation services. Specific questions on taxes or legal matters as they relate to your individual situation should be directed to your tax or legal professional.